NEW YORK, March 17th.

A proposed treaty between the United States and the Indian tribes in the Northwest, providing for the purchase of a tract of land, has been submitted to the Senate by the President. The treaty, if ratified, will extend the boundaries of the United States into the Northwest Territory, and will be accompanied by the conclusion of a convention for the protection of the Indians in that region. The treaty is based upon the principle that the United States have a right to acquire the land lying west of the Mississippi River, and that the Indians are bound to surrender their claims to the same. The treaty provides for the payment of an indemnity to the Indians, and for the establishment of a reservation for their use. The treaty is regarded by the President as a just and equitable arrangement, and is expected to be ratified by the Senate.
