

He took him up on his horse behind him, and the next was seen of him he was found hanging on an oak tree about ten feet from the about 200 yds south of the first bridge you cross, as you go east from Covelo, and just inside J. S. Rhosboughs field. A few days later, I was passing by the lower quarters, and saw "Pikes" head up on a pole about 30 ft high, and the Konkows having a war dance around it.

The other one was killed a little later. On the morning of the 6th of August 1862 the battle at the upper head quarters was fought. The glackey, had for two or three years, come in, and camped on the Reservation under the pretence of trading with the Uteas; and when they would leave, would drive off a lot of stock.

On these occasions they would leave most or all of their women at home. The year before they had driven off a band of horses, and which, as I have stated before, caused the Hoss Carren fight. The Citizens got together, and came to the conclusion that it was about time to stop it. They made the attack in the morning, as soon

As it was light enough to see to shoot. The Indians were in something like a brush Corral. The white men attacked them from the east side. The battle not last more than a minute or two. A good many got away unhurt. Twenty-two I think was buried in a trench under one of those big oak trees which stand in among the Barns at the upper quarters. Half as many more were found among the willows, to the north and west.

Shade Lamb was shot through heart with an arrow. He pulled the arrow out, but did not live two minutes.

L. D. Montague was shot with a rifle of large caliber, presumably by one of his own men, and his thigh broken, which laid him on his back for fifteen months, and which did not get well for more than three years; and the effects of which can be noticed at any time we see him on the street.

I forgot to speak of Henry J. Abbott being wounded with an arrow in the Horse Carriage fight. They pulled the stick out, but the point staid in; and was lodged in a place where the